Let's de-Google the Internet: Alternative approaches to the digital world

Concept

This workshop, as part of the LLLWeek, explores the potential educational and democratic uses of digital technology. Digital technology has become essential to our society – but we have not truly prepared for its educational consequences.

The software and services offered by the major digital industries, which count education as one of their markets, promote a point of view that often contradicts emancipatory educational practices. Given the restrictions imposed by this digital technology, what are the political challenges of a free and collaborative approach to digital technology that is respectful of our privacy and pedagogical choices?

This workshop aims to identify the issues at stake and to review together how Europe is preparing for them.
